Observation

- Militants are individualists.
- They only think about defending their rights.
- They are enclosed in consumer society.
- In reality they are activists, that is to say citizens wanting to be in a group to unbuild society.
- Indeed, the students only learn to unbuild society.

Observation (continued)

- Really, militancy is deteriorated by liberalism, an ideology present everywhere in media.
- Liberalism consists to say that the individual makes society.
- The consumer society promotes the short term, individualism demanding rights without including society.
- Thus, activists' demands are not linked to society.
- So, the politicians agree with a hierarchy, an individualist activist, therefore, thinking about their advantages.

Possibility

- Using greatest thinkers' examples, we can start writing poems first to understand ourselves, then political writings about the great thinkers like Plato, Leibniz, Henry Charles Carey, Planck, Einstein, Lyndon Larouche.
- These thinkers have made politics and give an opinion on politics.
- The activist dialogues with his fellow citizens to get our best.
- He meets with non-mediatised political groups because they are crucial.
- The militant campaigns for the general interest, which adds new rights.
- He knows that the individual interest is corruptible.

What is the general interest?

- The general interest use the current society's economy.
- It improves society in order to adapt it to a future full of new rights.
- It allows disruptive technologies not used, because they require a public currency.
- It asks to campaign to establish a productive public currency, a currency that makes it possible to provide money to productive citizens, production then increasing to export and have a trade surplus with other countries.
- Then new rights can be created.

What is the general interest?

- However, we can introduce new rights without waiting, for a better future.
- For example, education through multiple intelligences and creativity makes it possible to create geniuses at school.
- Thus the creative student gets society and transforms it well.
- But the general interest requires to be ethical and clear about that we want to do.

Why write?

- When we listen, we keep little of what we listen to. Listening is mainly used to filter. It is an oral consumption that does not allow to grow.
- When we read, we retain half of what is read. We are still in consumption.
- When we write, we retain almost everything we write, because we build. So we're growing.

Militate

What to write?

- We write about our future and how to become free.
- We write workshops to show an ideal future.
- We then look for that is missing from this future so that it should become ideal.
- We then find that it is the energy that makes the economy, which the fourth generation power plants make it possible to reindustrialize to build the future.

Become a scientist, an artist, a philosopher.

- The higher hypothesis is used to determine nature's laws. When a superior hypothesis defeats all of our hypotheses, we have to check if it is true.
- So we keep this upper hypothesis and we grow.
- For this, it is about philosophizing and writing poems, songs.
- We may think that this is a long time coming. But the higher hypothesis is not often found and turns everything upside down.

Use your brain

- After having determined our intelligences, we know what we can be placed on.
- There are 7 multiple intelligences, that can be associated. We use a few of these all the time.
- When reading a book about multiple intelligences, we then write about that we can do.

Create workshops

- Creating workshops makes it possible to show something that we have found. So we grow with the others.
- We show that we have found and the others criticize us to improve it.

Conclusion

The activists who offer to campaign for their interests make me laugh. They only militate to become corrupt. Then is the society viable? Is their job crucial? Do they only imagine a good future?

Growing with the higher hypothesis to change mentality makes it possible to adapt an utopia that can become real.

Yes liberalism deceives people. Yes a future is possible.
